CICERO Baffles BUGS

Bugs Bunny was downcast. Not a carrot, not a penny in the house. For the hundredth time he shook his tin-can bank. But there was no jingling answer; it really WAS empty.

"No use pryin' off the lid to see if there's any foldin' money in it," moaned Bugs. "I never have THAT kind o' stuff."

Tossing the empty bank to one side, he started up the ladder which led to the ground above his home. The bright warm summer sun greeted him as he emerged, but failed to lift his drooping spirits.

"I can't snitch any more carrots from poor old Elmer Fudd," he mumbled as he walked slowly across the fields. "I've already nibbled away most o' his crop."

Wandering aimlessly down the street, Bugs rounded the corner near Petunia Pig's house. Abruptly he stopped and stared. Seated on the curb was Cicero Pig, Petunia's little nephew. And Cicero was engaged in an astounding occupation. He was trying to count dozens and dozens of crisp green dollar bills.

"Cicero!" exclaimed Bugs. "Where'd ya get all that dough?"

Cicero started and glanced up. "Gee whizz, Bugs! Look what you've gone and done—made me lose count again!"

Bugs dropped down beside Cicero. "Ya can sure be an annoyin' little twirp at times," he sighed. "Come on now, 'fess up! Where'd ya latch onto the loot?"

"I didn't latch onto it," said Cicero. "An' it's not loot. It's MONEY!"

"Okay, chum," agreed Bugs, trying not to lose his temper, "where'd ya find the money?"

"In this wallet." Cicero held up a large brown leather wallet.

"BUT WHERE'D YA FIND THE WALLET?" shouted Bugs.

"Don't yell," Cicero said calmly. "I can hear you." He started to replace the money in the wallet.

Bugs gritted his teeth and waited. No use trying to rush Cicero. He would answer when he was good and ready.

"I was coming to spend the day with Petunia," Cicero said finally. "But first, I stopped to buy some bubble gum."

"Y-e-s?" prompted Bugs.

"When I came out of the store," continued Cicero, "I unwrapped the gum and put a lot of pieces in my mouth—all at once—so I could blow a super-duper bubble." He puffed out his cheeks in demonstration.

Bugs nodded. "You're a genius."

"And I blew and blew and blew... and the bubble got bigger and bigger and bigger...then it burst!"

"How tragic!" Bugs held his head in mock anguish.

"I was scraping the gum out of my eyes—it was awful sticky—and then I saw it!" Cicero's eyes were big with excitement.

"A pink elephant, I PERSUME," choked Bugs.

"Don't be silly," smirked Cicero. "I saw the wallet."

"No!" Bugs held his hands clasped tightly together, so he would not yield to temptation and shake Cicero.

Cicero nodded. "It was lying on the grass right beside the sidewalk!"

Bugs's mind was racing. He needed one of those bills... "I s'pose you're gonna have a lot o' fun with all that dough," he said slowly.

"I AM not!" declared Cicero. "I'm going to return it to its owner, of course."

"Of course!" echoed Bugs, "only, before you take it back, how about me borrowin' a buck for some carrots so I won't starve to death?"

"But..."

"Don't worry," Bugs interrupted. "It'll be okay. Ya see, I'll really be borrowin' it from you. 'Cause when you return the money to the owner he'll natcherly reward ya for bein' so honest. Then, you tell him how I borrowed a buck an' for him to take it out of the reward money...it'll really be YOUR money I'll be borrowin'! Get it?"

"No!" answered Cicero. "But knowing you, I'd better let you borrow a dollar and get out of here before you talk me out of two or three. Here!" He held out a dollar bill.

"Thanks, chum!" Bugs grinned. "After ya deliver the wallet, come down to the market an' tell me how ya made out."

No longer downcast, Bugs dashed down the street and into the market. "Fifty cents worth o' carrots, Mister Springer," he sang out happily. "An' make it snappy! I'm starvin'!"

When Mister Springer took Bugs's dollar bill in payment, he frowned and said, "What do you know, Bugs! I'm all out of change. Wait here while I run next door."

Bugs was contentedly munching on a big juicy carrot when Mister Springer returned. But he almost choked when he saw the burly policeman at Mister Springer's heels.

"Here he is, Officer!" shouted Mister Springer.

And the next thing Bugs knew, he was in the city jail.

"Where did you get this counterfeit money, kid?" asked the Police Captain not unkindly.

With chattering teeth, Bugs told about Cicero, the wallet and the borrowed buck. "I didn't know it was counterfeit—honest!" he finished.

At that moment, in rushed Cicero waving a handful of bills.

"Don't worry, Bugs!" he cried. "I'll save you! Here, Officer." Cicero tossed the handful of bills on the desk. "I want to bail him out."

"Not with THIS money," said the Captain. "It's counterfeit."

Cicero gulped. "B-But it's my reward money...for returning a wallet."

"Mind telling me who gave it to you and where he lives?" asked the Captain.

"'Course not," Cicero replied. "His name's Bo Bullen and he lives at number ten Riverview Street."

The Captain barked an order. And two detectives raced for a police car. In a little while they were back with Bo Bullen, securely handcuffed.

"That's him!" exclaimed Cicero. "The mean old crook!"

After Bo was led away, the Captain beamed down at Bugs and Cicero. "You boys have done us a great favor," he said. "We've been after that man for months." He reached into his pocket. "Here's a dollar for each of you—and I guarantee THIS reward money is okay."

Outside the jail, Cicero quickly grabbed Bugs's dollar. "Thanks, pal, for paying back the dollar you borrowed from me!" He laughed as he dashed off down the street.

Bugs looked after him, perplexedly scratching his head. Something was wrong somewhere. But what?
